

Selling high value services – powered by SPIN®

The market for legal services is now highly competitive. Successful commercial organisations employ highly trained sales professionals to identify and develop new business. Most professional firms do not, but the need to generate fee income is just as strong within the professional sector as it is within the commercial world.

The skill to win new work is now a significant factor in establishing a competitive edge. The risk to individuals who stay in the professional role of ‘expert’ waiting for clients to approach them is that they will lose out to more active and skilled competitors.

In our experience from working with lawyers on business development we have identified a number of issues:

- When in front of the client, individuals don’t ask enough questions – they believe the client expects them to know!
- They don’t ask the right questions which will uncover the client’s needs
- Professionals tend to rush in with solutions as the ‘expert’ before they have fully identified the client’s needs and fail to address the issues the client wants to address.

As a consequence, they lose out on many business opportunities as the client fails to see the value of their services.

Objectives

- Understand the concepts of new business development and know how to apply them
- Be able to maximise new client wins and cross-selling opportunities.
